

V-X13 "Violet Toxin"

The V-X13, commonly referred to as the Violet Toxin, is a chemical compound originally developed by Robotics Corporation before the Uprising.

The project's original purpose was to create a substance capable of neutralizing hostile individuals without relying on conventional lethal weapons. However, after a series of failed tests and dangerous side effects, the project was abandoned.

Following the Uprising, Voithos recovered the research data and modified the toxin for his own use.

How Voithos Uses It

Voithos is equipped with multiple toxin reservoirs and delivery systems integrated throughout his body.

These systems are connected to tubes and vents located in his:

- Legs
- Back
- Arms
- Claws

When Voithos identifies a target, mechanical valves open and release V-X13 into the surrounding environment.

Within seconds, the area becomes covered in a dense purple haze, slowly poisoning anyone nearby.

The sound of pressurized valves opening serves as a warning sign that the toxin is about to be released.

Narrative Purpose

Voithos does not view V-X13 as a weapon.

He sees it as a method of purification.

According to his distorted logic, humanity is fundamentally flawed and inefficient. Those who cannot survive exposure to the toxin are considered unworthy of existing.

To Voithos, the toxin is simply another step toward creating a more perfect world.

Gameplay Concept

The player has a contamination meter that increases while exposed to V-X13.

As contamination rises:

- Vision becomes increasingly blurred.
- Audio becomes distorted.
- Breathing grows heavier.
- Movement becomes less reliable.

If contamination reaches critical levels, the player collapses and dies.

This mechanic makes Voithos more than a standard enemy. His presence actively contaminates the environment, turning entire areas into dangerous zones and reinforcing his identity as a toxic industrial machine rather than a simple pursuer.
